A Glossary of Hina Doll Accessories

Awasegai and Kaiko
360 awasegai (shells for the shell-matching game) are contained in a pair of kaiko (shell containers). They were once indispensable items in the trousseau of the Japanese nobility. Daimyo families made one set for princesses when they were born, and made miniature sets for their Hinamatsuri dolls when they married.

Daitsu and Kaigu
Shelf with tea ceremony utensils including furo (brazier), kama (teakettle), mizusashi (water jar), kensui (rinsing bowl), shukudate (vase for tea ladle) and futazuki (rest for kettle lid). These utensils are set in place before the guests enter the teahouse. The host brings other utensils such as chaire (tea container), chawan (tea bowl) and chashaku (tea scoop). Then the host conducts the tea ceremony.

Fusego
Frames for scenting robes. To perfume clothes, an incense burner is placed inside the frames, and robes laid over them.

Gobon and Goishi in Goke Pot
Go is a game of strategy played by two players placing black and white Go stones alternately on a 19×19 grid-lined board, each attempting to encircle the opponent’s pieces. The miniature Go board in the dolls’ accessories is very small in size, and the Go stones are too small to pick up by hand, so our curators always struggle in placing the Go stones for display. Despite the difficulty, however, the curators work with scrupulous detail in placing the stones, recreating the realism and tension of the game for the exhibit.

Harai-bako (Kushi-bako)
Harai-bako, usually stores 33 pieces of kushi combs, which have varied fineness of teeth, as well as comb-cleaning kits (kushi-bori, tsubo-kushi-bori, etc.). Kushi-bori assemblies a toothbrush and tsubo-kushi-bori a shaving brush in their shapes.

Hasamibako
A pair of chests for carrying clothes. Porters shouldered the chest with a pole passed through the handles.

Hazō and Tsunodarai
An ever and wash basin with four grips. Two pairs of “tsuno” (horns) were used as handles for carrying the basin. They were usually used together.

Hirobuta
A tray for clothing. Presents for guests were sometimes placed on it.

Hokai
A pair of meal boxes for picnicking.

Ichimatsu-doll
This “Ichimatsu doll” (a type of Japanese hand-crafted doll) holds a story of friendship and exchange between Japanese and American children. In 1927, as many as 15,000 blue-eyed American dolls were presented to Japanese children for the spring Hina Festival, and in return, 58 Ichimatsu dolls were produced by donation and sent to the U.S. as courtesy return dolls. Masako, 14-year-old daughter of Tsuneo Matsudaira, who was Japan’s ambassador to the U.S. at that time, presented this friendship gift to children in the U.S. at an official presentation ceremony held in Washington D.C. Masako later married the 30th head of the Owari Tokugawa family, Yoshimoto, and continued to cherish the same type of Ichimatsu doll, hand-crafted by the famous master craftsman Kōnyūsai Takizawa, who was the central figure involved in the production of the “return dolls.”

Inu-hariko / Inu-bako
A pair of dog-shaped boxes. These are male and female dogs, which were meant to be displayed on wedding days. They also served as amulets for children’s health and longevity.

Jikirō
Food-serving container.

Jinbako
A box for incense wood. Jinbako generally connotes a tray and some small boxes, with several kinds of incense wood stored in them separately.

Kakeban
Footed serving tray used in formal ceremonies. Dishes for one person are placed on it.

Kezukuri-ningyō
Dolls of dogs, rabbits, monkeys or other creatures, made of silk. Most of the kezukuri-ningyō exhibited here were owned by Yoneko, wife of Yoshichika, the 19th head of the Owari Tokugawa family. (Meiji period, 19th–20th century. Private collection.)

Kyōsoku
For relaxing when seated. Armrest made up of long, flat board and two legs.

Mimi-darai
A hemispherical water basin with two ear-shaped handles. It was used for haguro, the application of black paint to the teeth of a married woman. The substance for blackening teeth was dissolved on a watsukihane board put across the waterbasin.

Nagamochi
Long carrying chest to store and transport clothes and furnishings. Carried on the shoulders of two people by a long pole inserted through two metal suspension fittings attached to both sides of the chest.

Sashi-daru
Pair of box-shaped containers for sake. It has a spout on the top.

Santana
A set of three cabinets, kurodana, zushidana, and shodana.

Shodana, a cabinet for setting utensils

Tabakobon
Tobacco tray and smoking accessories including kiseru (pipe), tabakoire (tobacco case), hujfuki (a pot for ashes), and hire (a kind of brazier).

Takimono-nsbuso
A pot made of aloe wood, sandalwood, cloves, or other material, for a mixture of kneaded incense. Takimono-tsubo was covered with kuchinot (a cloth to cover the mouth) and a decorative net, and placed on a hexagonal or octagonal stand.

Yutan
Cover for long carrying chest (nagamochi). Covered (causus), and Chinese-style chest (kurabitsu). Originally, yutan were made of cloth or paper, and coated with oil, for protection from rain and dust.

The Doll Festival of the Owari Tokugawa Family 2020

Exhibitions heralding the coming of spring in Nagoya

From February 8 (Sat) to April 5 (Sun), 2020

The Doll Festival of the Owari Tokugawa Family 2020

The doll festival, also known as the “Peach Blossom Festival,” involves the display of the Emperor and Empress doll, three female attendants and five musicians, and various other dolls and miniature accessories, constituting a resplendent annual observance that announces the arrival of spring.

The dolls and doll accessories that were made to order for the princesses of the Owari Tokugawa family have been passed down to the Tokugawa Art Museum and all of them boast a high quality that is befitting of the senior line of the three branches of the Tokugawa family. Particularly stunning are the accessories bearing individual family crests, which are miniatures of the actual wedding trousseaus of the princesses rendered in truly amazing intricacy and delicate beauty. Another highlight is the collection of Meiji, Taishō and Shōwa–era displays overflowing with dolls and accessories and reaching as much as two meters high by seven meters wide. Here, we introduce this world of the Doll Festival reaching heights of luxury and elegance achievable only in such a household of the daimyō elite.
History of the Hina Doll Festival

The origin of the Hina Doll Festival is said to be found in ancient Chinese ritual practices, in which people went to the waterside to cleanse their bodies for purification and wash away invisible sins and impurities onto the body of a simple paper doll then released it into the water. This practice survives today in the form of nagashi-bina (dolls floated downriver) rituals that are still held in some localities in Japan.

Beside these, there were also small toy dolls for girls called hinai (miniatures). Such dolls were described as early as 1000 years ago in the Tale of Genji, the world’s oldest novel. Combining all of these practices, the Hina Doll Festival gradually became established, starting among the courtiers, as an annual festival to celebrate the healthy growth of girls and wish for happy marriages for them in the future by displaying a pair of male and female dolls.

Later, in the Edo period (1603–1868), the Hina Doll Festival became popular not only in samurai households but it also spread to merchant families. The dolls also developed into more lavish sets of miniature dolls depicting the entire imperial court with the obina (male doll) and mebina (female doll) on the top. During the 18th and 19th centuries, dolls depicting three ladies-in-waiting, five musicians, and three court attendants, as well as miniature furnishings imitating those of wealthy court or daimyō houses were also added. What they displayed for the dolls was two to three stages in the mid-Edo period, with these additions more and more gorgeous platforms as high as seven or eight stages appeared toward the late Edo period.

According to Kashira yawa, written in 1821, in the inner quarters of Edo Castle (Oko – where the consort of the shogun resided) around that time, relatives of the attendants serving in the Oko were allowed to view the displays of dolls. This custom was called Hina Haken (Viewing the Dolls), and continued to the end of the shogunate.

Yūsoku-bina - The Tokugawa Art Museum’s Hina Doll Collection -

The Tokugawa Art Museum has a large Hina Doll collection. The most gorgeous sets of dolls belonged to Lady Kanehime (1831–1902), who married the 14th Lord of Owari, Tokugawa Yoshikatsu (1824–1883), at the age of 19. It was customary for a daimyō’s daughter to bring her Hina Dolls with her when she married into another daimyō family, so Kanehime’s dolls were passed down in the Owari Tokugawa family and eventually to the Museum.

All of Kanehime’s Hina Dolls belong to the category of yūsoku-bina. The term yūsoku means “manners and customs of the imperial court,” and the dolls conform to the many rules for the costumes, and hairstyles to be worn at court. The colors, materials and tailoring styles of the robes are determined according to the position and age of the wearer as well as the season and occasion for which they are worn, and yūsoku-bina beautifully copy those different court costumes. Five larger pairs of obina and mebina (more than 30 cm high) with a set of five musicians, and five smaller pairs of obina and mebina (about 10 cm high) with a set of three ladies-in-waiting and a set of seven musicians have been preserved. They represent different types of costumes worn at the court, according to the rules of costume of the imperial household. Only members of the upper strata of society, such as imperial family members, court nobles, or feudal lords, were able to own yūsoku-bina, because they were made by special order and were very expensive.

Miniature Furnishings Accompanying the Hina Dolls

When a daughter of an upper strata family married, various marriage furnishings were prepared as her trousseau. Besides clothing, they included larger items such as vehicles and shelves, smaller items such as stationery, musical instruments, cosmetic equipment, tableware, board games, etc., as well as Hina Dolls.

Lady Sachigimi (1820–1840) was an adopted daughter of the aristocratic Konoe family, and married the 11th Lord of Owari, Tokugawa Narinari, in 1836. When she moved from Kyoto to Edo, her retinue numbered over 1000 people, and its splendor was even featured in popular songs of the time. Her belongings were decorated with shimmering lacquer maki-e (artistic designs particularly in gold and silver), featuring the crests of both the Konoe and Tokugawa families as well as the chrysanthemum, a felicitous symbol of longevity. Her trousseau, known as the kiku-oriieda (chrysanthemum-stems) maki-e furnishings, is one of the largest extant in Japan today and constitutes one of the most precious holdings of the Museum.

Miniature furnishings of her kiku-oriieda trousseau were also ordered and produced for Lady Sachigimi, each item being a fine copy of the actual furnishings with the same designs. In addition, she had another set of miniature furnishings, which is lacquered with designs of scattered peony-between-two-stems crests. Although the actual Hina Dolls have been lost, with these miniature furnishings they must have made gorgeous decorations for the Hina Festival in her household.

Gosho Ningyō, Dolls of the Imperial Palace

“Gosho” dolls are modeled after infants and their chubby features. They were made in the mid-Edo period in Kyoto. They have large heads, white skin, and are proportioned to have a body three times the size of the head. These dolls were termed “gosho ningyō” during the Meiji period. It is said that daimyō from western Japan received these dolls from the imperial palace (gosho) when they stopped by Kyoto. As they came from the imperial family or the shogunate, these dolls were favored by the upper class as celebratory gifts. They suitably wear elegant, refined expressions. Among these dolls, there are those who carry auspicious symbols such as cranes, turtles or treasures. Then there are those with felicitous patterns on their garments. In both cases, these features demonstrate the dolls’ role in warding off calamities and in inviting prosperity. Other dolls include those dressed as actors of Noh theater, or as samurai or court figures, showing their great variety.

Hina Dolls of Three Generations: Meiji, Taishō and Shōwa eras

Exhibited on the largest platform in Exhibition Room 8 are the Hina Dolls and furnishings of three generations: Meiji, Taishō and Shōwa eras. They were the dolls of Mrs. Tokugawa Yoneko (1892–1980), wife of Yoshichika, the 19th head of the Owari Tokugawa and the founder of the Tokugawa Art Museum; those of Mrs. Tokugawa Masako (1913–1998), wife of Yoshitomo, the 20th head; and those of Mrs. Tokugawa Michiko (1936–), wife of Yoshinobu, the 21st head of the family. On the top are several sets of dairi-bina (obina and mebina) and on the lower stages are several sets of three ladies-in-waiting and five musicians, as well as a number of miniature furnishings. Through these, one can see how the traditional Hina Doll Festival has been passed down from generation to generation in Japan.

Hina Dolls donated by Mrs. Tanaka Tsuguko

In 2019 (the 1st year of Reiwa), a set of Hina Dolls was donated to the Museum by Mrs. Tanaka Tsuguko. Tsuguko is the first daughter of Tokugawa Yoshinobu and his wife Michiko, and the dolls were the ones which the parents had custom-made especially for their first daughter. With characteristic angelic faces, these dolls were wooden-made, using the kimekomi (woodgraining) techniques. The kimekomi techniques make up the costume by tucking a side of “nishiki” (Japanese brocade) or “chirimen” (silk crepe) fabric pieces into lines engraved on the wooden body. Along with the luxurious tiered doll decorations held by the Meiji-Taishō-Shōwa three-generation wives of the Owari Tokugawa Family, please enjoy the newly added set of traditional dolls.
